Martin's Message:

It is February and we are in the midst of our tulip cutting season. However, for me it is already time to start planning for next year. The tulips bulb growers in Holland are pre-selling their crops right now for the 2012 season. This year the acreage of tulip bulb production in Holland has dropped by approximately 6%. To me this is a good sign because in years past, too many tulip bulbs on the market does mean lower bulb prices, but also more cut flower production. In my humble opinion, there is still too much cut flower production and/or not enough demand. Not knowing yet what this season will bring, I still need to make decisions on what varieties, and how many bulbs to buy for 2013. So, when you talk to Jacinth, Jennifer, or myself, please give us your suggestions on tulip varieties, colors, sizes and shapes. It will help me make better decisions on what to buy for next year.
